Banking Sector

New Credit Institution Law will strengthen risk governance among banks and empower the regulator to act swiftly to maintain financial sector stability

On 18 January 2024, the National Assembly passed the amended Law on Credit Institutions. The new law will serve to reduce banks' exposure to large borrowers and large shareholders. These new measures will help to enhance risk governance and business practices among banks and support their asset quality. In addition, the new law now includes detailed and clearer guidelines on the regulator's powers to intervene and address issues swiftly and effectively in ailing banks, for example, those facing deposit runs. These guidelines provide greater clarity and certainty over the regulatory actions that can be taken to resolve weak banks and maintain stability of the financial sector.

Lower credit concentration and stricter shareholder ownership and stricter disclosure requirements reflect the regulator's intent to enhance bank risk governance and business practices. Under the new law, credit exposure to single borrowers and their related parties – based on the new and expanded definition of related parties – are limited to 10-15% of total capital, down from 15-25% previously. Local institutional shareholders and their related parties may only hold up to 10-15% in equity stake, down from 15-20% previously. These stricter measures will serve to limit the linkages between banks and large corporate groups that often go beyond the regulatory limits, and urge banks to strengthen internal risk governance and lending practices.

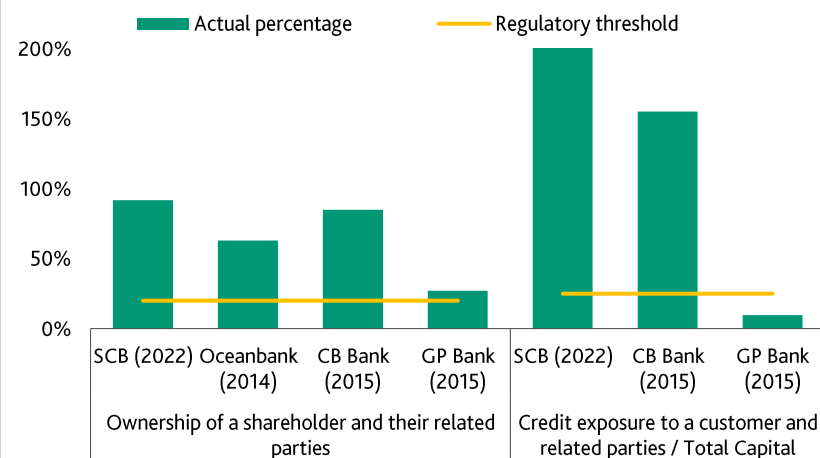

Clearer and detailed guidelines on the regulator's powers to resolve ailing banks are positive to facilitate swift and timely intervention by the regulator to address issues in weak banks and maintain financial sector stability. The new guidelines include specific criteria related to a bank's solvency and liquidity position that will warrant early intervention by the regulator. In addition, the guidelines provide more clarity on the regulator's powers to resolve banks that are placed under special control.

The new law provides banks with a proper legal framework to support future debt recovery efforts. The new law incorporates many of the new mechanisms used by banks to manage bad debt and improve recoveries in recent years, including the buying and selling of bad debts and collaterals, implemented under Resolution 42 that expired in December 2023. On a negative note, banks will not have the legal rights to seize collateral under the new law and debt recovery through the court process will take a longer time.

Lower credit concentration and stricter shareholder ownership and stricter disclosure requirements reflect the regulator's intent to enhance bank risk governance and business practices.

Recent incidents of banks that faced financial troubles reflect the linkages between banks and large corporate groups that often go beyond the regulatory limits (Exhibit 1). Under the new law, credit exposure to single borrowers and their related parties – based on the new and expanded definition of related parties – are limited to 10-15% of total capital, down from 15-25% previously. Local institutional shareholders and their related parties may only hold up to 10-15% in equity stake, down from 15-20% previously. Moreover, shareholders owning from 1% charter capital are required to disclose information, down from 5% previously (Exhibit 2). These stricter measures will serve to limit the linkages between banks and large corporate groups similar to the cases in the past and urge credit institutions to strengthen internal risk governance and lending practices (Exhibit 3).

The new law provides banks with a proper legal framework to support future debt recovery efforts.

The new law incorporates many of the new mechanisms used by banks to manage bad debt and improve recoveries in recent years, including the buying and selling of bad debts and collaterals, implemented under Resolution 42 that expired in December 2023 (Exhibit 5).

On a negative note, debt collection may take a longer time as banks will not have the legal right to seize collateral under the new law and have to rely on the borrowers' collaboration and the court decision.
